Many of my clients use parenting apps and are tempted by the free versions. However, they have commented to me that these apps are difficult to set up and give rise to more issues than they assist with. In situations where communication is already proving challenging, the free apps have served to sometimes cause further difficulties rather than alleviate them. One example, the parents were blaming each other for the ‘set up difficulties’ and as a result were not willing to use an app at all due to their initial extremely poor experience. In my view it is not only the ease of set up of OurFamilyWizard but also the ongoing support that is provided that puts it head and shoulders above free apps, but they just don’t compare in terms of ease of use, set up and features.

Before : Samantha Jayne McFadzean, Registrar, Family
Division

While the parents were able to agree how some of the Mother's concerns could be addressed, many matters were not agreed. This fact reflects one fundamental issue upon which the parents did agree which was that their communication with each other has been poor and that this must improve for the child's sake.

party to contact the other through this medium only – save in respect of an emergency. Opportunities for acrimonious exchanges must be limited.

Provided both parents are maintaining and seeking to promote the best interest of their child, neither parent can expect the other to conform to their ideal. The difference in approach of each parent is neither unusual nor damaging to the child; it is the potential conflict which may cause harm.
